Prepare your students

This phase of any field trip is perhaps the most demanding and time consuming, but is crucial to the success of the experience for everyone. Research has shown that students given pre-trip instruction learn and retain more from a field trip than those who receive no preparation. The following suggestions will make a difference in your next field trip:

Introduce the trip as a part of a lesson. Its always beneficial to integrate your trip into your curriculum. It's a good association tip, when you say George Washington, for the student to visualize the building where he stayed. Association plays a big part in any educational process.

Stimulate students' interest for the trip. Use artifacts from the internet, photos, brochures, or videos to pique interest. Generate excitement with questions like, "How many steps are there on the Nation's Capital?"

Discuss your expectations for learning and behavior. Students may have certain expectations of your trip based on previous trips taken with other teachers or organizations. Prepare them mentally for the experience by reviewing a schedule of activities or itinerary. Explain what and how they will learn and what tools they will use. Don't assume that students possess the observation and exploration skills necessary to conduct the activities you or someone else has designed.

Prepare students with a twenty-four hour "staging period." Remind students to get a good night's rest and to eat a nutritious breakfast prior to departure. Ask students to mentally prepare themselves for the experience by thinking about how their behavior at school might not be appropriate in public spaces like museums or historic sites. Remind them to dress appropriately, which means taking into consideration the weather and the venue. Like behavior, clothing that passes the school's dress code may not be appropriate in another location.

Develop a schedule of activities or itinerary. Review this with students and ask them to agree to follow this schedule. You can even ask them to sign the itinerary as they would a learning contract.

But the best tip we here at DAVID TOURS & TRAVEL can offer is have fun. If there is a tour you have in mind or are interested in doing, but don't see it listed here, feel free to contact one of our representatives, at 866-442-7227, who will gladly help you create the class trip your students will talk about in the future!

HAVE GREAT TRIP!
